6. Is DCIBIN required by the board of education to be accredited?

Answer: No, we are not required by the board of education to be accredited because we meet the Religious college exemption requirement.

Currently, 28 states in the United States of America exempt religious schools or bible colleges from their higher education licensing, certification, or accreditation process; Virginia is one of those states. Among the states that exempt religious colleges, the statutes vary based on (1) the types of institutions that qualify for an exemption, (2) the programs of study the institutions offer, (3) the degrees or diplomas conferred, and (4) the filing requirements. In the State of Virginia, any institution of higher education whose primary purpose is religious education can offer Religious or theological education. The school must indicate the institution's primary purpose on all degrees or diplomas conferred and state that the institution is exempt from state approval. By state requirement, the institution must also state in writing to the Director of the Council that it complies with the provisions set forth for religious college exemption.

DCIBIN is NOT a diploma mill institution. The academic programs offered at DCIBIN are in-depth and supervised by well-educated instructors and faculty. Students are required to complete exams, quizzes, practical work and assignments, which count towards their final grade in the completion of their program of choice. Students earn course grades, grade point averages (GPA's) and can graduate with honors.

Though, we meet the Religious College Exemption requirement, DCIBIN is currently pursuing religious accreditation, to give our students leverage and access to government financial aid and the ability to transfer to or continue their tertiary education in other schools.
